Generation of Stereotypes

I think the authors of "Social Work with Native Americans" (September 1975 issue)—Ronald G. Lewis and Man Keung Ho—do an injustice to the many dedicated social workers living and working on the various Indian reservations throughout the country. The authors describe the reservation social worker as existing in an isolated state of innocence, whereas, in fact, many of the social workers I have met in the Public Health Service have a clear, precise understanding of Indians' culture and problems. The writers take liberty in stereotyping the reservation social worker's lack of understanding, but in turn they have a field day stereotyping the Indian when, in fact, each Indian, each tribe, each reservation is different. There have been too many years of stereotyping to justify this simplistic approach to problem-solving by two academicians.

It is important to realize that American Indians were not raised in a vacuum, but rather have been exposed extensively to the Anglo society and have an appreciation for the help the reservation social worker provides. Indians are humans who have basic problems of living, and social workers, with a sensitivity and understanding of the culture and reservation life, have that capacity to provide the necessary assistance for effective intervention. Most of the reservation social workers have worked for years on a specific reservation, knowing the people, understanding their culture, and appreciating the differences that exist between the two cultures and have provided effective social work intervention.

Code of Ethics Project

I am currently working at the national office of the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) and am conducting a study of the Code of Ethics with a view toward revision. Several sources of knowledge and experience will be utilized. One is the past efforts within NASW to analyze and assess the code. Another is found in the growing attention to ethics in the literature. A third source is the activities of the Committees on Inquiry, both on the national level and in local chapters, which deal with alleged trespass of the code. A fourth source is the experience of every social worker who has faced and resolved an issue dealing with ethical concerns and who has sought guidance for this task from the code.

Every social worker who has had such an experience has a contribution to make to this study. Please write up these experiences, including your assessment of how helpful you found the code to be, and send them to me at the National Association of Social Workers, 1425 H Street, N.W., Suite 600, Washington, D.C. 20005.
